The at-$200,000, and whose trial resulted in torneys for the prince placed their figures so high that the other fellows could not consent, and the matter was so reported to Miss Caldwell. She, too, could not agree. She went to the dence of Claus Hansen, ten miles prince, "remonstrated with him," told southwest of here, Peter Stelly and him that she "really loved him-well really?-and as a proof of her real love would consent to a "favorable consideration of his demands." But again her attorneys kicked, telling her that she was acting very imprudently in promising so much; that complications would arise to make her a very unhappv wife-it seems that the lawyers were better posted about the frailties of princes than the giddy thing whose case they were managing-and seeing the wisdom of their statements, she acquiesced- "Then," says she, "the prince bade me good-bye, saying that whenever my attorneys should deem it proper to accede to his demands, he would fulfill his marriage contract. With these words he left me and I have not seen him since." Poor thing!
